

The Hillside
by Eric Kay
260 words

"I really like it here. Sitting under the autumn trees and talking is the best part of life."

The smoldering sun was edging toward the lip of dusk, bruising the sky. The smell of the wild flowers and the tall trees on the hillside permeated the air, and offered a haven from the haze of the city below. Only the quiet drone of insects accentuated the calm rustling of the ankle-deep grass, just starting to lose its green. The air was finally cooling, yet the stickiness of the late afternoon still clung in the thick air.

"Me too. It's cool to just hangout. My house is always so crazy. My old man would be getting home about now. I like it a lot better here."

"I'm the same way. Life can really start to get to you after a while. Look at all of those people down there. Up here, it's like nobody can touch you. They all look like they could use a break too. It seems like they're just running in circles, chasing their tails."

He smiled a lopsided smile. "My dad said I can't get a dog. I asked again, and he really came unglued. Last time he just shouted. I tried to be really cool about it this time and bring it up real careful-like. All of a sudden he just let loose."

Again the silence overtook him. As the sun went down, he rose, wiped the sweat from his tender mouth. He left his solitary spot and went home, alone.